How do history and culture organizations stay current while showcasing the past?

The news that several institutions are facing scrutiny over the provenance and acquisition history of artifacts in their collections, and that others are turning over records to various justice initiatives, highlights the crucial role of archives in the pursuit of righting past wrongs.

These histories, often of groups subject to discrimination and marginalization, are being relocated to address the wrongs of the past. This goes to the very heart of why archives are so important to the pursuit of human rights for all. We rely on archives and artifacts, both national and personal, to create links between past and present, to understand the people who went before us, and to bring much needed justice following human rights abuses.

French Guinean descendants of the Paris human zoo victims have asked for remains of their ancestors to be returned to their homeland. The French government is looking into how they can facilitate the restitution of foreign human remains held in French public collections.

In the US, the Mütter Museum, which houses medical oddities and started in the 1850s as an effort to educate doctors and medical students, is conducting a review of all artifacts. Executive director Kate
Quinn asks “what is the role of a museum in the world today? Why are we here, why do we exist, and who are we here to serve?”.

In Canada, the National Archives is working to identify, digitize and transfer six million pages of federal Indian day school records. These records tell the story of schools created to force Indigenous children to assimilate into mainstream Canadian culture.

The stories of the Paris human zoo victims, the Mütter Museum, and the Canadian Indian day school records are all examples of how archives and artifacts can be used to address the wrongs of the past. These actions can be a powerful act of recognition and respect, and a way towards ensuring that archives and artifacts are shared, displayed and interpreted in a way that helps us to understand the legacy of our actions.

Togo: Conference Call for Proposals - Colonisation allemande et traitement mémoriel : entre regards croisés, approches récentes et perspectives interdisciplinaires (Lomé, Togo). En ce XXIe siècle, l'héritage colonial allemand est encore très présent dans l'imaginaire collectif de populations anciennement colonisées principalement. Il est visible à la fois dans la littérature coloniale, les musées, les monuments (y compris les monuments d'honneur ou les mémoriaux) et la photographie coloniale. Ce constat oblige à se pencher sur la question coloniale et d'en souligner la pérennité à travers d'éventuels discours et récits cachés ou occultés dans les représentations et les expositions sur le colonialisme. Il s'inscrit également dans un contexte de résurgence de la mémoire coloniale en Allemagne depuis 2004 qui font intervenir différentes disciplines avec des éléments et des approches plus récents de la question. Forced labour haunts the streets we walk today and the spaces we take for granted. Blood and Dirt explains, for the first time, the making of New Zealand and its Pacific empire through the prism of prison labour. Jared Davidson asks us to look beyond the walls of our nineteenth- and early twentieth-century prisons to see penal practice as playing an active, central role in the creation of modern New Zealand. Journeying from the Hohi mission station in the Bay of Islands through to Milford Sound, vast forest plantations, and on to Parliament itself, this vivid and engaging book will change the way you view New Zealand.

Imprisonment and forced labour, here and for Indigenous people in the Pacific Islands, were a deliberate means of breaking property and traditional work practice into the mould of capital.” — Rob Campbell reviews 'Blood and Dirt'.

“Imprisoned workers were essential to creating the basic infrastructure of New Zealand’s Pacific empire. Government agents needed government buildings, so offenders who couldn’t (or wouldn’t) pay their fines built residencies, courthouses and other imperial premises.” — Jared Davidson.

Forced Labor

New Zealand: Blood and Dirt: Prison Labour and the Making of New Zealand. Forced labour haunts the streets we walk today and the spaces we take for granted. Blood and Dirt explains, for the first time, the making of New Zealand and its Pacific empire through the prism of prison labour. Jared Davidson asks us to look beyond the walls of our nineteenth- and early twentieth-century prisons to see penal practice as playing an active, central role in the creation of modern New Zealand. Journeying from the Hohi mission station in the Bay of Islands through to Milford Sound, vast forest plantations, and on to Parliament itself, this vivid and engaging book will change the way you view New Zealand.
